Diverse ways of thinking can inspire creativity, drive innovation and bring new insights to address things from a different, perhaps more efficient, perspective.

When presenting data on immigration it is relevant to note the difference between foreign-born population and foreign citizens. Why does this matter for Slovenia? Mainly because more than half of those who were born abroad are nowadays citizens of Slovenia. According to Eurostat 250.226 people were residing in Slovenia in 2018 who were born abroad and moved to Slovenia at some point of their life, meaning that foreign-born individuals represented 12.1% of total Slovene population in 2018. Slightly more than half of them (54 %) acquired Slovene citizenship by naturalisation or by origin, meaning that foreign citizens were on January 1, 2018, representing 5,9% of total population.

The majority, that is 85 % of all foreign-born population living in Slovenia was born in one of the Western Balkan countries, mostly Bosnia and Herzegovina (43 % of all foreign-born population), followed by Croatia (18% of all foreign-born population), Serbia (10 % of all foreign-born population), North Macedonia and Kosovo (each of them 7 %).

Max partners believe that migration makes places more diverse. It certainly can create new challenges but also important opportunities. To make such opportunities a reality, diversity needs to be properly addressed and managed at the local level, encouraged not only by community-led initiatives but actively supported by all the actors who live together in a society (public administration, private sector, schools, neighbours' associations, etc.).

With our local DDE, we aim at having a joint discussion to learn how migration can benefit the socio-economic development of our European societies in general and Slovenian cities in particular, which societal challenges can be tackled at local level thanks to different initiatives supporting diversity and by presenting the experience of migrants and refugees themselves from their positive perspective.
